Birthstone: Onyx

ONYX always carried a strange virtue, the power to make orders effective. If a commander of olden times had an onyx attached to his sword or saber no subordinate would ever be able to question the wisdom of his orders, not even secretly. Thus it came that the near and the far orient valued onyx higher even than diamond, the king of gems was the "shaham." It is uncertain whether it belonged to the tribe of Joseph or of Gad on the breastplate, but that the stone was especially valued is proven by the fact that the buttons by means of which the plate was fastened were made of onyx.

In old China nobody was allowed to possess a seal made of onyx but the Emperor himself. If somebody reported a formation where onyx might be expected, special guards of the Emperor surrounded the place and if onyx was found there was much honor and high rewards for the man who reported the place. Honors and rewards were even extended to his family. But "false alarm" was punished by the executioner who took one foot of the man who had caused the imperial guards to come unnecessarily.

The Jews of Biblical times also valued onyx for the making of seals, especially because the gate through which a soul passed when it entered or left a body was made of two slabs of onyx, each inscribed with six tribal names. Naturally the responsibility connected with keeping the seal and being in command had its disadvantages, he who possessed onyx was wakeful at night and his sleep was often disturbed. According to Greek legend it was Cupid who brought onyx into being, one day he found Venus sleeping on a river bank and cut her nails off, they turned to stone and became the first onyx on Earth.

FEBRUARY

Birthstone: Sapphire

ALTHOUGH sapphire has been assigned by some ancient authors to the month of September, the majority connects this beautiful gem with the sign of Aquarius which "rules" the greater part of February. It is only natural that this stone was brought into relation to a "watery" sign on account of its color. This same color, believed to be beneficial to eyesight like green, made it a charm that protected the eyes. Powdered sapphire was believed to be a certain cure for sore eyes; worn close to the heart it increased the heart's strength and cleaned the blood stream. It was also good against the Plague, a circle drawn around an ulcer with a sapphire made the swelling disappear, at any rate it prevented it from spreading further.

When Adam was expelled from Paradise the angel Raziel gave him a book engraved on a sapphire and when Moses received the Ten Commandments he carved them with a diamond on two tablets of the same material. While the ordinary sapphire pacified enemies and freed from captivity and enchantment, the star sapphire was a potent love charm, Helen of Troy owed all her conquests to one she always wore. Charlemagne also had a talisman made of two large sapphires cut en cabochon, it helped him not only against enemies but also against poisonous animals. What happened to a venomous animal when there was a sapphire near we can learn from the writings of Bartholomeus Anglicus, the famous English monk of the 13th century: "The sapphire is a precious stone and is blue in color most like the heaven in fair weather and clear, and is best among precious stones and most apt and able to fingers of kings. Its virtue is contrary to venom and quencheth its every deal. And if thou put an addercop (spider) in a box, and hold a very sapphire of Ind at the mouth of the box any while, by virtue thereof the addercop is overcome and dieth, as it were suddenly. And this same I have seen proved oft in many and divers places."

Birthstone: Moonstone

NO OTHER earthly jewel, not even the very lucky or very dangerous opal and the mysterious and sinister bloodstone, was so closely associated with cosmic happenings than the moonstone. An equally mysterious zodiacal sign had to be found for it, finally Pisces, the fishes, were chosen. With the waxing and waning of the moon the properties of the gem changed, one had to be well acquainted with secret lore to use it to one's advantage. But if one knew the secrets one had a powerful charm that attracted love while the moon waxed. While it waned one could tell future events with the help of the stone. It was held in the mouth to make one see future events, a prayer to Gabriel, the angel of the moon, asking him to help by God's grace, increased the certainty of the prophecies. If one had a moonstone with the image of the moon, it waxed and waned in brilliance as the real moon waxed and waned—Pope Leo X possessed one gem of this kind. More adventurous natures had the image of Diana cut in the stone, then it gave victory, wealth and wisdom.

Whoever carried a moonstone had nothing to fear of cancer, dropsy, lunacy and the dangers of the sea, it signified the hope that everything will turn out well in the end.

Moonstone is still the sacred stone of India, if it is displayed for sale it is always on a piece of yellow cloth, the sacred stone has to be shown only on cloth of the sacred color. It is the favorite gift to lovers because it arouses their tender passions and lets them see what is in store for them.

Birthstone: Amethyst

AMETHYST, lucky stone of those born under the sign of Aries was probably assigned to the tribe of Dan on the breastplate of the High Priest. Its ancient reputation says that it either prevents or cures drunkenness, later (in a book by Belleau, printed 1576 and dedicated to Henri III) it was asserted that Bacchus himself created the stone. It was told that the god, enraged by some offense, swore that his tigers should devour the first human being he met on his way. It so happened that he met a pure and beautiful maiden, named Amethyst who was on her way to worship at the Temple of Diana. To save her the goddess changed her into white stone and Bacchus who had meanwhile forgotten his wrath, poured the juice of the grape over the stone thus causing its beautiful violet hue.

Since amethyst prevented drunkenness it had a number of similar virtues, it had the power to control evil thoughts, to cure not only alcoholic intoxication but also that caused by love. It prevented contagion from diseases and gave easy victory to soldiers because the enemy's weapons could not harm them as long as they wore this stone and thereby stayed sober.

But it was a good stone to wear not only for the soldier but also for the business man. Since misleading emotions were successfully kept out of office and business books it made its owner shrewd in business matters and thus assured success and riches.

Birthstone: Agate

AGATE (and also moss agate) the stone of all persons born under the sign of Taurus, assigned on the breastplate of the High Priest either to Gad or to Benjamin was highly valued for its virtues in the Middle Ages. A learned man by the name of Orpheus asserted:

"If thou wear a piece of Tree Agate upon thine hand the Immortal Gods shall be well pleased with thee; if the same be tied to the harness of thy oxen when ploughing wheat-crowned Ceres shall descend from heaven with full lap upon thy furrows."

But the full measure of this stone's potency we learn from an Anglo-Saxon book of the 11th century: (Translation by Dr. Singer.)

"Of the stone called agate it is said that it has eight virtues,

One is that when it thundereth it hurteth not the man that has this stone with him,

The second virtue is that in whatever house it be, therein may not a fiend be,

The third virtue is that no venom may hurt the man that has the stone with him,

The fourth virtue is that if the man that hath on him secretly the loathed fiend if he takes in water fragments of this stone then is that soon made plain in him which before lay hid,

The fifth virtue is that he who is afflicted with any disease if he take that stone in water he is soon well,

The sixth virtue is that witchcraft hurteth not the man that hath it with him,

The seventh virtue is that he that taketh the stone in drink he has the smoother body.

The eighth virtue of this stone is that no bite of snake kind may hurt him that tasteth the stone in water."

Coral, Jade, Alabaster and Lapis lazuli are also said to be beneficial to those born under the sign of Taurus. But if neither of them is available, Opal will always do, because, as Boetius de Boot wrote so convincingly: "It has the virtues of all gems because it has all the colors."

Birthstone: Aquamarine

THE largest aquamarine (blue beryl) ever found was discovered in Brazil in 1910, it was more than 18 inches long, weighed almost 250 pounds and was sold for $25,000.00. What a delight such a stone would have been to physicians and to apothecaries in those times when it was hard to distinguish a well-stocked pharmacy from a jeweller shop. Aquamarine was so good for curing "weak" eyes, ground in aquavita (alcohol) it could be used effectively to stop diarrhoea or loss of blood. Pulverized in wine it helped against persistent cough, "strengthened" a "weak liver," cured inflammations of the eyelids. Without any alcoholic accompaniment, just worn on the finger or around the neck it made gay, sharpened the intelligence, increased the frankness of its wearer, exposed the lies of others and made in general the relations to other people pleasant. It was especially valuable to judges and to sea captains because it gave the ability to decide questions of legal character justly and unhesitatingly and assured safe crossings of unknown waters. While aquamarine, when cut as a gem, preserved health and youthfulness, fashioned as a mirror it was the true Magic Mirror that revealed hidden enemies, allowed to look into the future and informed lovers about the true character and true beauty of the prospective wife or husband. And when the magic mirror had promised happiness in married life it kept its promise and defended the couple against outside influences that might disturb matrimonial peace.

But the foremost virtue of the aquamarine was not even known to everybody. If one possessed a large stone, no matter whether it was cut as a gem or polished as a mirror and was in distress or had other wishes—they had to be just!—one only had to go deep into the forest and rub the stone. No dwarf would resist this magic call and none would refuse to grant the wish.

Birthstone: Emerald

EMERALD, one of the most precious stones, always commanded not only prices comparable to those asked and paid for diamonds but was also equally high esteemed. The Rabbinical legend claimed that it was one of the four stones given to King Solomon by Jehovah himself, thus bestowing power over all creation to the wise King. Even old Pliny, that Roman grouch who was as sceptical as a man of his time could be admitted that "the beholding of this stone refreshes and restores again a sight that has been dimmed." The Persians claimed that a man possessing an emerald charm enjoys the special protection of God.

One of the authors of the numerous "lapidaries," Cardano, believed in the virtues to repel demons, refreshen the sight, strengthen the memory, making an eloquent speaker of its owner, quicken the intelligence and averting terror. But he was very doubtful as to the assertion that it made a man economical and hence rich, from his own experience he was forced to conclude that this particular power of the emerald must be small.

How long the firm belief in the virtues of emerald prevailed shows a passage in the official London Pharmacopoea as revised by Culpeper in 1683:

> "Being worn in a Ring, it helps or at least mitigates the Falling-sickness and vertigo. It strengthens the memory and stops unruly passions of men. It takes away vain and foolish fears, as of Devils, hobgoblins, etc., and causes good conditions; and if it do so being worn about one reason will tell him, that being beaten into a powder and taken inwardly it will do much more."

Needless to say that the priests of Israel took this stone for themselves, the tribe of Levi had its name inscribed on it on the breastplate. Later many kings and emperors wore it, because it revealed the truth, mainly that of lover's oaths.

Birthstone: Ruby

THE RED stone that is the lucky stone for people born under the sign of Leo and that represented the powerful tribe of Judah on the breastplate of the High Priest is the most wonderful of all gems. The diamond, full of splendor as it is, needs the sun's rays to sparkle, the ruby glows even in the dark in its own light. The "gem of gems," as the Hindus call it, coagulated of tears Buddha wept—others said rubies are diamonds colored with the blood of a maharanee slain unjustly and in anger—lights the Halls of Heaven. And when Cathay was at the peak of her power, the emperor had a ruby as big as a human skull resting on a golden pillar in his sleeping room to light it all night.

Wisdom, health, wealth and happiness it gave to its wearer and warned him of approaching danger by losing its fire and color until the danger had passed. It could even make its wearer invisible, but since the stone itself always remained visible this helped only occasionally. However, whoever wore a flawless ruby could dwell in the midst of his enemies without fear, they would not attack him. The most beautiful and flawless rubies were not found in the earth, but in the heads of serpents and dragons, the famous ruby Régale de France was occasionally credited with this origin. Louis VII of France wore it when he visited the tomb at Canterbury in 1179. The monks asked him whether the stone was intended as a gift, the king denied and offered 100,000 florins instead. The monks accepted this offer but the stone detached itself from the hand of the French king and fell on the large stone slabs of the tomb. There it remained until Henry VIII ascended to the throne. He had it set in a ring again which he always wore on the thumb. Rubies are emblems of true love and of passionate devotion and Henry knew it . . .

Birthstone: Hyacinth

HYACINTH, a brilliant zircon, stone of those born under the sign of Virgo, owes its name to an unfortunate Greek youth, Hyakinthos, friend of Apollo. The god unknowingly caused Hyakinthos' death when they were throwing discs, the beautiful flower that bears the name of the youth too sprang from his blood when he died.

Of the gem the learned Thomas de Cantimpré asserted that it was a powerful charm against melancholy and poison and that it gave him the love of God and man. Francis Barrett fully agreed with the learned Frenchman when he wrote:

> "The jacinth also possesses virtue from the sun against poisons, pestilences and pestiferous vapors: likewise it renders the wearer pleasant and acceptable: conduces also to gain money: being simply held in the mouth it wonderfully cheers the heart and strengthens the mind."

Anselmus Boethius de Boot knew that hyacinth prevented insomnia, especially when caused by an overworked brain. To the peasant hyacinth brought bountiful harvests, the physicians used it as a charm (not to be taken internally) against bowel disorders, a somewhat strange combination of virtues. It is true that magic mirrors might be fashioned from large stones—none of the several varieties of zircon crystals grows large, the size of a pea is about normal—but it was not advisable to do so because such a mirror was likely to reveal only the unpleasant events that were to come. It was much safer to use hyacinth only in accordance with the teachings of the church, even the priests themselves had a use for it because it fortified the mind against all kinds of temptation. It is probably for this reason that it became the stone of Virgo and it may be still true that the virtue grows with the size of the stone.

Birthstone: Diamond

DIAMOND, the "Adamas" of old, was missing on the breastplate of the High Priest, either because it could not be engraved with a tribal name or simply because a diamond of the necessary size was too expensive for the poor Israelitic people. Later, however, when gems were assigned to the symbols of the zodiac the diamond was not forgotten. The judges of the World Beyond were sitting on diamond thrones, Fate itself hid its face behind clouds of diamond. The stone that could not be cut by any agency than by another diamond became the symbol of justice. Thus it came to be associated with the other symbol of justice, Libra, the scales, ruling sign of the greater part of October. Since no man was absolutely just, diamond powder was a deadly poison if swallowed and it is known that one of Benvenuto Cellini's enemies once tried to poison him with a powdered diamond. It failed to work and not only because the poor jeweler to whom the diamond had been given for pulverization had substituted a small piece of glass for it.

A diamond worn in a ring, according to Anselmus Boetius de Boot, would repel poison, pestilence, witchcraft, madness, terror dreams and evil spirit and give victory, constancy and serenity. But it should not be worn on the wrong side of the body. As Sir John Maundeville, the famous old "knyght of Engilland" wrote:

> "A diamond should be worn on the left side of the body for its greater value there than on the right, for the strength of their growing is towards the North, that is, the left side of the world and the left part of a man is when he turns his face to the East."

It is for this reason that diamond rings are still worn on the left hand.

Birthstone: Topaz

THERE is disagreement among learned lovers of precious stones whether Topaz had a place on the breastplate of the High Priest. Some assert that the tenth stone, the one representing the tribe of Naphthali was a topaz, others claim that it was only a yellow jasper or a chrysolite. The second stone, the stone of Shimeon, has also been called topaz, others say it was a peridot, a chrysolite or a light-green serpentine. But there was never any disagreement that topaz was the "Stone of Strength," even Pliny did not deny this virtue. It was also certain that it was the appropriate gift among friends, that it prevented bad dreams, banished fear of death, gave a painless passing when death finally came, made susceptible to impressions from astral sources and even gave light in the dark.

While it could not ward off death the topaz at least did not permit a certain kind of death to occur: drowning. It was also good against eye diseases, the stone had to be placed in wine for three days and three nights and then the wine had to be rubbed on the eyelids before going to sleep. If one could not sleep topaz helped too, a little of it taken internally in wine cured insomnia and also asthma.

All topazes of the ancients came from a certain island in the Red Sea which was eternally hidden by clouds during the day, hence the Greek name of the island "Topazein" ("to seek"). But at night the clouds dispersed and the glow of the stones led the "chosen few" to the island where they could collect the gems if no angry god prevented them from so doing. But if only one of the men had poison on him all the labor was in vain, because the stones did not give off light any more and grew so lusterless and dull that they looked like ordinary pebbles.

Birthstone: Turquoise

Most desirable of all the lesser gems was turquoise, a stone that was especially valued in Germany. Albertus Magnus, the famous medieval German monk claimed that the turquoise (—the Türkis of the Germans—) prevented accidents in general and especially accidents to the eyes. In Egypt turquoises inscribed Allah are still in use as charms against eye diseases. They were also praised as a medicine against lung trouble but should not be taken internally.

When, to quote Sir Walter Scott:

"The fair Queen of France
Sent him a turquoise ring and glove
And charged him as her knight and love
For her to break a lance"

she gave the best protection imaginable to her knight. A man who wore a turquoise could not be harmed when he was thrown from horseback. Anselmus Boethius de Boot, the physician who knew precious stones so well, reported that he himself was once saved by his turquoise when he lost his way in a moonless night and his horse stumbled into a ditch. Neither he nor the horse were harmed but the stone was shattered. It was always the turquoise that broke in place of its owner's bones. De Boot had received this stone when he was a young man, the previous owner had been an old and sick Spanish gentleman. The stone looked as if it were only malachite, but as soon as it had a new and healthy young owner it recovered its lost color and grew to splendor again. In Germany the turquoise was once the favorite stone for engagement rings, it remained unchanged as long as love lasted. And if the young lovers looked at it in the morning when they woke up a happy and prosperous day was certain to come.
